Bartel was born in Brooklyn, New York, in 1938. He developed a passion for film at a young age, and he began making short films while still in high school. After graduating from the University of California, Berkeley, Bartel moved to Los Angeles to pursue a career in filmmaking.

Bartel's early films were largely experimental, but he gained critical acclaim for his 1972 film Private Parts, a satirical comedy about a group of young people who start a sexploitation film company. Private Parts was followed by a series of other successful films, including Death Race 2000 (1975), Eating Raoul (1982), and Lust in the Dust (1985).

Bartel's films were often controversial, but they were also highly praised for their originality, humor, and social commentary. Bartel was a master of satire, and his films often poked fun at the conventions of Hollywood and society in general.

Bartel was also a gifted character-driven filmmaker. His films are filled with memorable and eccentric characters, and he had a knack for getting the best performances from his actors.

Bartel died of a heart attack in 2000 at the age of 62. He left behind a legacy of groundbreaking films that continue to inspire and entertain audiences today.
