

Strangers Assume My Girlfriend Is My Nurse

I've been in a wheelchair since I was 18 years old. I have a rare genetic disorder that affects my muscles and bones. As a result, I need help with everyday tasks, like getting dressed, eating, and bathing. My girlfriend, Sarah, is my primary caregiver. She helps me with everything I need and is always there for me.

We've been together for five years, and we're very happy. However, we often get strange looks from people in public. They assume that Sarah is my nurse, and they treat me differently because of it. I've been asked if I need help crossing the street, and I've even been offered a seat on the bus because people think I can't walk.

It's frustrating and embarrassing to be treated like I'm not capable of taking care of myself. I'm a grown man, and I can do everything I need to do with Sarah's help. I don't need to be pitied or treated like I'm a child.

Sarah and I have learned to ignore the stares and the whispers. We know that we're a strong couple, and we're not going to let anyone else tell us otherwise. We're proud of our relationship, and we're not going to change a thing.

I wrote this book to share our story with the world. I want to show people that love is not limited by disability. I want to inspire others to embrace their differences and to live their lives to the fullest.

If you're interested in learning more about our story, please read my book. It's available on Our Book Library and at all major bookstores.
